Speaker: Dr. Diane Janvrin
Topic: Spreadsheet Design

Diane Janvrin will be speaking this month on Spreadsheet Design. Dr. Janvrin is an Assistant Professor of Accounting at Iowa State University. She received her B.A. from Central College in Pella, her Masters of Accountancy and PhD from the University of Iowa. Diane teaches Accounting Information Systems. She has been published in Information and Management and the Tickmark – the Iowa Society's practitioner journal. One of her research interests is spreadsheet design and spreadsheet errors.

Diane will be speaking to us this month on how good spreadsheet design will reduce the occurrence of errors in spreadsheets. I personally (and I imagine many of you) have had no formal training in spreadsheets. Diane helped me design a project for my class, and I was amazed at what I didn't know! Please come and find out how to improve your spreadsheets.

President's Message

I've been thinking this week about my birthday. I'll be turning Enron 40 (I learned something from their accountants). Anyway, as I was trying to figure out how to tie Enron accounting and birthdays together, it occurred to me to question whether I'm capitalizing my life or expensing it. And which is appropriate, anyway?

After all, to paraphrase Professor Harold Hill in The Music Man, if you focus too much on tomorrow, eventually all that's left is a bunch of empty yesterdays. And yet, Aesop counters this with the fable of the grasshopper and the ant – living just for today may leave us cold and hungry tomorrow.

It all comes down to balance – after all, assets exist to throw off value, and long-lived assets are supposed to throw off value over several years. We meet once a month to renew our skills and increase our human capital and to enjoy each other's company – some for today, some for tomorrow – partly expense and partly capital.

I also wonder about how much of my life is off the balance sheet – how much am I hiding from myself and my shareholders. I like to believe I keep an honest 10K, but I am like everyone else and make a point to conceal some assets. I find I do this at work more as a get-along-go-along tactic. I suspect my organization would be better off if all of my fellow employees were more forthright. It would be a different world with one set of books -- if face value was the real value.

Mostly I need a pitcher of grasshoppers for my birthday. See you Wednesday at Gateway.

Carpe Diem!

Sue Ravenscroft wins Award for Ethics Research

In spring term of this year Sue Ravenscroft, Associate Professor in the ISU Accounting Department, and her co-author Steven Kaplan (of Arizona State University) were awarded the fifth annual Glen McLaughlin Prize for Research in Accounting Ethics. The three-person reviewing committee consisted of Eric Noreen of INSEAD, Mariann Jennings (a well-known ethicist who spoke at the most recent Federated Schools of Accountancy annual meeting) and Don Ostas, an economist at University of Oklahoma. The prize is notable in that it is awarded only if the committee believes the submissions are of high enough quality; there is not a mandate to make an award each year. In addition, the award is notable because it includes a $10,000 honorarium. Sue and her co-author presented the paper at the Price College of Business at the University of Oklahoma and were honored at a dinner held to make the presentation of the award.

The paper is on the topic of how managers respond when they learn that a colleague has engaged in earnings management for the purposes of increasing a bonus. We found that even when managers were willing to attribute earnings management behavior to the environment, i.e. to say that people were responding to dysfunctional incentives facing them, managers still considered their colleagues who engaged in earnings management to have lower abilities along non-moral dimensions. One member of the review committee said this paper won the award because the committee agreed with the implication that if internal labor markets are effective discipline mechanisms firms may be able to spend less time and money designing formal control systems.
